

Australia. A place where work and study meet.

Australia's vocational education and training (VET) institutions allow you to step outside the classroom and practice your skills in the workplace. Put down those heavy textbooks, students. The real world awaits...

Australia's VET institutions offer the opportunity to hone your skills in real and simulated work environments. The practical expertise you gain in the workplace will give you a genuine advantage over other graduates.

At these institutions, you can study a wide range of disciplines, including: business and management, science and technology, design and arts, communications, sport and recreation, community service and health, tourism and hospitality, engineering and building, horticulture and land management, and English.

Programs are provided by public Technical and Further Education (TAFE) institutes, private colleges and a number of schools and universities. Industry and Government work together to develop training outcomes, which are then implemented according to nationally endorsed training packages.

This allows you to apply knowledge learnt inside the classroom, outside in the real world. You learn by doing, rather than just reading from textbooks. Your initial qualification can be built on to achieve higher qualifications, provide the basis to begin or change a career, or assist with further study at university.

If you do decide to enter the workforce straight away, you'll find that your practical training in the classroom will set you apart from other job seekers. Employers in major industries, such as business, information technology, tourism, engineering and community services recognise the value of hands-on, real world training. Many specifically look for VET graduates to fill their staff vacancies, and appreciate their ability to quickly adapt to their new work environment.

Institutions offer the opportunity to hone your skills in real and simulated work environments.

You can also use this training as a pathway to other avenues of higher education. Depending on your qualification, universities may provide you with credit toward a Degree. This gives you the practical skills as well as the theory from a university Degree. You'll leave Australia with two qualifications that are recognised around the world – a major advantage over other graduates.

Practical qualifications offered in Australia.

You can choose these courses anywhere in Australia. You can achieve an AQF qualification (usually at Certificate or Diploma level) in specialised areas of study.

Like all Australian institutions, your courses will meet rigorous quality checks to ensure it meets the high standard of excellence expected of Australian education. You'll find more information about how the Australian Government ensures you receive the world-class education you deserve, on the Study in Australia website.
