

Are you an international student having trouble at work?

You are not alone, there are people who can help.
Find out where you can get the help you need.

Use the student support services available to you

This is useful when

- you want to talk to someone about a workplace issue
- you want to be referred on to other services (such as legal services) and need more information

What to do

Organise a time to talk about your issue. Student services may not have all the answers, but will know other organisations who can help. You can also call the Young Worker's Advice Service on (02) 6225 8104 to hear information on your workplace rights, or to book a time to talk to someone on the phone.

Get help from the Fair Work Ombudsman (FWO)

This is useful when

- you want to know more about your work rights and protections in the workplace
- you want help to solve a workplace issue, or to make a complaint

What to do

Contact the FWO for free information and advice. You can get advice without saying your name. Call the FWO on 13 13 94 or visit their website at fairwork.gov.au. You can also ask to speak to someone in your own language by first calling a free translation service at 131 450. To report a workplace issue anonymously, go to fairwork.gov.au/tipoff.

Seek legal support

This is useful when

- you want to, or are considering, taking legal action
- you can't resolve a workplace issue

What to do

Ask student services whether your education provider has any partnerships with free legal services.

Even if you are having issues at work, there might be reasons why you choose to stay at your job or not raise the problem. Sometimes that makes sense, but remember, nothing will change if you do not take action.
